

The Sensory Ecology of Sexual Selection in Peafowl

Animals constantly make assessments that have far-reaching consequences on their fitness. Selecting mates and assessing rivals is essential for successfully reproducing and requires animals to selectively attend to relevant aspects of their environments. However, we know little about how animals shift their visual attention. I will be discussing results from projects examining selective attention during sexual selection using peafowl as a model system.