SYNOPSIS

The story focuses on two plotlines: the romance between Rose Maurrant and her neighbor Sam Kaplan; and on the extramarital affair of Rose's mother, Anna, which is eventually discovered by Rose's abusive father Frank.

Act 1
The play takes place on the doorstep of tenement on the Lower East Side of Manhattan on two brutally hot days in 1946. The residents of the tenement lament the incredible heatwave that is gripping New York. Anna Maurrant agrees to come downstairs and be sociable, and as she descends, the neighbors gossip about the rumor that Mrs. Maurrant and Steve Sankey, the milkman, have been having an affair.

Daniel Buchanan enters, jittery; he's nervous because his wife is upstairs about to have a baby. He and the women sing of the perils of childbirth. Mrs. Maurrant's husband Frank comes home. He mentions that he is going on a business trip to New Haven, and fumes about Rose not being home. He storms into the house, and Anna sings about the importance of putting your faith in a brighter tomorrow. Steve Sankey enters and the attraction between the lovers is palpable. Mrs. Maurrant heads off in the same direction, to the delight of the gossips. Mrs. Olsen runs in excited and says that she has just seen Sankey and Mrs. Maurrant together on the street.

Lippo Fiorentino returns home from work with an armful of ice cream cones for everybody. When Anna returns Frank chastises her for not disciplining the children. Maurrant and socialist neighbor Abraham Kaplan argue about parenting, and the argument almost becomes physical. Frank sings about how he longs for a return to traditional moral values. Jennie Hildebrand returns from High School graduation and the neighbors join in the celebration, only to have it cut short by the awkward return of Steve Sankey. Frank leaves to go to the local bar to have a drink, and Anna goes in the house. As soon as they leave, the neighbors all begin gossiping again, to the consternation of Sam.

All the neighbors say goodnight, leaving Sam to sing of his crippling loneliness. Rose enters with her boss, Harry Easter, whose interest in Rose has him promising her a gig on Broadway. Rose sees her father returning home and tells Easter to leave. Frank questions her about Easter, and goes upstairs to bed, furious. Rose runs upstairs to fetch a doctor for the now– laboring Mrs. Buchanan and she passes young Mae Jones and her suit, Dick McGann. The two have been out dancing and are flirting. On Rose's return, Sam attempts to save her from the brutish advances of Mae's brother Vincent but is laid out on the sidewalk. Sam is embarrassed that he was humiliated in front of Rose. Sam laments the terrible strife of living in the slums, but Rose calms him down by reminding him of a poem he once read her. Sam and Rose share a kiss on the sidewalk, and then Rose runs up to bed.

Scene 1: Daybreak, the next morning
As the tenement awakens, Mrs. Jones and Anna enter, and discuss Mrs. Buchanan, who the exhausted Anna has been looking after all night. Rose and Frank come out of the house and Rose tries to persuade him to be nicer to her mother. Anna returns and the three have a family argument about Frank's behavior, which is witnessed by young Willie. Sam's sister Shirley confronts Rose about her intentions with the Jewish Sam, and this, the family argument and another incident with Vincent opens Rose to the idea of running away with Sam. Sankey appears, and the fed–up emotionally drained Anna appears at her window and tells him to come upstairs, as Frank has gone on his business trip. As Sankey hurries upstairs he passes Sam coming out of the house, who looks up at the window and sees Mrs. Maurrant pulling the shades shut. Frank returns, having changed his mind about the business trip, sees the shades pulled shut and runs upstairs. A series of gunshots ensue, and Frank runs out of the house with a gun as a crowd gathers. Rose returns and realizes what has happened. The ensemble sings of the tragedy.

Scene 2: Mid–afternoon, the same day
Two young nursemaids appear at the house and sing about the scandal of the murder that has already spread around the city. Rose enters, dressed in black. Sam enters and tells Rose that he has taken Willie from school round to her aunt's house. Shirley enters and expresses her condolences to Rose, and the two of them go up to Rose's apartment together. They are interrupted by the discovery of Frank hiding. He and Rose talk about the murder, as the crowd looks on. The officers take Frank off and the crowd disperses, leaving Rose and Sam. Despite Sam's pleadings, the events of the day convince Rose to leave alone. She bids goodbye as the residents once again lament the unbearable heat.

DIRECTORS NOTES

Kurt Weill (1900–1950) grew up in a religious Jewish family in the Jewish quarter in Dessau Germany, where his father was cantor in the synagogue. Studying music at the Berliner Hochschule with the likes of Englebert Humperdinck and Ferruccio Busoni, by the mid 1920's Weill was well known in his homeland as a composer, having written numerous compositions from art song to chamber, piano and orchestral works, and also as a teacher, counting among his students Maurice Abravanel and Claudio Arrau.

While finding success in all areas, by the late 1920's Weill was drawn more to vocal music and musical theater. He teamed up with playwright Bertolt Brecht in 1928 to write perhaps his most famous work for the stage, The Threepenny Opera, starring his wife Lotte Lenya and featuring the song, “Mack the Knife”, who's fame was sealed with covers by Bobby Darin and Louis Armstrong.
After fleeing from the Nazi Regime in 1933, Weill landed in New York, where he made a study of American popular and stage music and worked to further adapt his music to new American styles in his work for Broadway, film and radio. His background in classical music, combined with this new focus on accessibility, got him working at creating American opera that would be both commercially and artistically successful. Weill wrote:

"It’s my opinion that we can and will develop a musical–dramatic form in this country (America) … it will develop from and remain a part of the American theater – 'Broadway' Opera, if you like. More than anything else, I want to be a part in that development."

This style of theater had a special attraction for Weill, because it would allow him to use a great variety of musical idioms – serious and light, operatic and popular, emotional and sophisticated, orchestral and vocal.

Weill saw Elmer Rice’s Pulitzer Prize winning Street Scene in 1930 and saw it as a great opportunity to apply this new technique. The collaborators chose Harlem Renaissance poet Langston Hughes as lyricist, to blend the realism of the story with the poetry of the modern language. This marked the first time a black man wrote words that a white man would speak on an American stage.

In order set the realism of the play to the modern music, Weill went as far as to travel to neighborhoods in New York, watching children at play, and accompanied Hughes to Harlem nightclubs to hear the newest musical idioms of black American jazz and blues.

The show received the first Tony Award for Best Original Score after the Broadway premiere in 1947. Weill and many critics have considered the score to be his masterpiece. His use of dialogue underscoring in particular is evolutionary, drawing from his work in both film and the theatre. Despite its success on Broadway, the show has never been revived there; it has however found a home as standard repertoire for opera companies around the world.

Tonight you will hear a synthesis of musical styles, from operatic arias and ensembles, with links and references to the style of the great Italian masters, to jazz and blues influences, to more traditional Broadway-style musical and dance numbers. It is this synthesis, of the classical and popular, for which Weill strove, and for which Texas State Opera Theatre has become known. I hope you enjoy the show!
